The Russian government has proposed creating an emergency energy service similar to the gas service

The authorities are studying the issue of creating a 24-hour hotline for electricity supply issues and a citizen notification system to respond to failures, said Deputy Prime Minister of the Russian government Alexander Novak. Two options are being considered for solving the problem of rapid response to failures. The first is the creation of a single dispatch service similar to the gas service - 04. The second is the launch of a single automated citizen notification system on electricity supply issues.
